Table of Contents

Dedication ................................................................. vii

Series Editors' Preface ........................................... ix

Chapter 1
No Matter Where We’ve Been, Here We Are! ......................... 1
Susan Kasten

Designing Writing Tasks

Chapter 2
Beyond the Five-Paragraph Essay: A Content-First Approach .......... 9
Nigel A. Caplan

Chapter 3
Modern Heroes: From Content to Composition via Critical and Creative Thinking .................................................. 19
Linda Forrester

Chapter 4
Writing to Embody: Engaging Students in Written Role Play ............ 31
Shawna Shapiro

Chapter 5
Using Second Language Learning as Content in a University
ESL Writing Course ...................................................... 39
Mark A. James

Chapter 6
Meaningful Writing Opportunities in the Community College:
The Cultural and Linguistic Autobiography Writing Project ............. 51
Gloria Park
Chapter 7
Media Participation as an End Point for Authentic Writing and Autonomous Learning ........................................ 57
Stephen Soresi

Focusing on Academic and Professional Writing Skills

Chapter 8
Multitext Synthesizing in Research Writing ..................... 69
Amina M. B. Megheirbi

Chapter 9
A Process–Genre Approach to Teaching Writing to Medical Science Graduate Students ............................. 77
Miao Yang

Chapter 10
“It May Be Possible” to Teach the Use of Hedging in EFL University Writing ........................................... 89
Jingjing Qin and Erkan Karabacak

Chapter 11
Service Learning and Writing With a Purpose .................. 97
Denise Vaughn

Chapter 12
From the Classroom to the Boardroom: Grammar and Style Across Genres in ESL Professional Writing ............ 107
Jennifer Haan and Karyn Mallett

Enhancing Critical Writing Skills

Chapter 13
Discourse Analysis: Bridging the Gap Between Linguistic Theory and Classroom Practice in Writing Classes ..................... 121
Peter McDonald

Chapter 14
A Case for Writer-Generated Annotation .......................... 133
Holli Schauber
Contents

Utilizing Technology in Writing Curriculum

Chapter 15
Wiki Writing Web: Development of a Web Site to Improve Writing Motivation in Exam Courses ............................................. 145
Christopher A. Baldwin

Chapter 16
A Chain Story Blog ........................................... 155
Najla Malaibari

Chapter 17
Authentic English Through the Computer: Corpora in the ESOL Writing Classroom....................................... 163
Vander Viana

Re-visioning, Revising, and Editing ESL Compositions

Chapter 18
Revising the Revision Process with Google Docs: A Classroom-Based Study on Revision in Second Language Writing ...................... 171
Soo Hyon Kim

Chapter 19
Great Expectations: Whose Job Is This Anyway? ..................... 179
Donald Weasenforth, Margaret Redus, and Nancy Ham Megarity

References ................................................. 193

Index ..................................................... 211
Dedication

To English as a second language writing teachers and their students everywhere. May all of your subjects and verbs come to an agreement.

To the talented contributors to this volume. Your level of professionalism and passion for teaching are inspirational.

To Dan, who fully supported this endeavor with encouragement, advice, and the gift of perspective.
The TESOL Classroom Practice Series showcases state-of-the-art curricula, materials, tasks, and activities reflecting emerging trends in language education and in the roles of teachers, learners, and the English language itself. The series seeks to build localized theories of language learning and teaching based on students’ and teachers’ unique experiences in and out of the classroom.

This series captures the dynamics of 21st-century English for speakers of other languages (ESOL) classrooms. It reflects major shifts in authority from teacher-centered practices to collaborative learner- and learning-centered environments. The series acknowledges the growing numbers of English speakers globally, celebrates locally relevant curricula and materials, and emphasizes the importance of multilingual and multicultural competencies—a primary goal in teaching English as an international language. Furthermore, the series takes into account contemporary technological developments that provide new opportunities for information exchange and social and transactional communications.

Each volume in the series focuses on a particular communicative skill, learning environment, or instructional goal. Chapters within each volume represent practices in English for general, academic, vocational, and specific purposes. Readers will find examples of carefully researched and tested practices designed for different student populations (from young learners to adults, from beginning to advanced) in diverse settings (from pre-K–12 to college and postgraduate, from local to global, from formal to informal). A variety of methodological choices are also represented, including individual and collaborative tasks and curricular as well as extracurricular projects. Most important, these volumes invite readers into the conversation that considers and so constructs ESOL classroom practices as complex entities. We are indebted to the authors, their colleagues, and their students for being a part of this conversation.

[Volume-specific paragraph to come]

Maria Dantas-Whitney, Western Oregon University
Sarah Rilling, Kent State University
Lilia Savova, Indiana University of Pennsylvania